A powerful series of solar expulsions hit Earth between 11 and 12 November 2025, generating a geomagnetic storm that made the Northern Lights Even in unusually low regions such as Sardinia, Piedmont and Valle d'Aosta. In the night between 11 and 12 November, the Italian skies were colored green. Earth was hit by a powerful November 2025 solar storm triggered by multiple X-class flares and a rare Cannibal CME, lighting up the sky with intense auroras. Here's what caused it—and why it matters. more Audio tracks for some languages were automatically generated. Learn more Born at the wrong. A cannibal solar storm slammed into Earth's magnetic field around 5 p.m. EDT (2100 GMT) on Sept. 1, sparking a geomagnetic storm that lit up skies across Europe and North America overnight. The storm reached G2 (moderate) levels according to both the U.K. Met Office and NOAA's Space Weather. Scientists have pulled back the curtain on one of the most extreme solar regions seen in decades, tracking it almost nonstop for three months as it unleashed powerful space weather. By combining views from two spacecraft—one near Earth and one orbiting the Sun—researchers followed a massive active. An aurora captured by a Northern Lights live webcam at the Land Hotel in Iceland on 12 November 2025. (Land Hotel) A series of three powerful flares and associated explosions of solar material out across the Solar System have set Earth squarely in the path of a "severe"-level geomagnetic storm. A rare solar storm recently pushed the northern lights much farther south than usual, lighting up skies in both the US and Italy. Many people who never expected to see an aurora from their hometown suddenly got a colourful surprise. One of the most common things people around the world share is the.
